SUMMARY

Once the results of the US elections were in, focus shifted towards the economy. The potential implications of Trump's and the Republican's control of both the Senate and the House, and hence a higher likelihood of pushing through their political agenda, caused uncertainty around trade agreements and fiscal deficits for example. Within the eurozone deteriorating economic data raised fears of a deeper slowdown while the US economy demonstrated resilience. The healthcare sector had a tough month, largely due to the political uncertainty post US election.

MONTHLY COMMENT

November saw heightened volatility across financial markets, driven by the dramatic US election, Trump's victory, his controversial cabinet nominations, fluctuating interest rates and currencies, geopolitical tensions as well as the earnings season. Donald Trump secured both the Electoral College and the popular vote. Republicans gained control of the Senate and the House of Representatives, paving the way for a potential shift in policy direction. This outcome sparked a mix of optimism and uncertainty among investors.

Economic implications post-election

Markets quickly shifted their focus to the economic implications of Republican policies and the cabinet appointments once the election results were in. Trump's proposed agenda included significant tax cuts, deregulation, and stricter immigration policies. However, his 'America First' stance which is centered on renegotiating trade agreements and imposing higher tariffs to partially fund tax reductions, raised concerns about widening fiscal deficits. Trump's victory was well received by a large part of the business community, but at the same time some concerns around potential increased protectionism and trade conflicts with major trading partners were raised. Initial market reactions included a rise in long-term interest rates as investors priced in potential inflationary pressures.

Swift cabinet appointments

By month's end, Trump had announced nominations for all key cabinet positions, pending Senate approval. Notably, hedge fund veteran, Scott Bessent, was tapped as Treasury Secretary. Bessent's track record of fiscal conservatism and skepticism toward extensive tariffs suggested an effort to reassure the markets and stabilize fiscal policy. Nevertheless, tensions regarding Trump's economic agenda remained apparent, leaving questions about how Bessent would manage competing priorities.

Eurozone showed signs of weakness

In the Eurozone, deteriorating economic data raised fears of a deeper slowdown, and a combination of rising wages and declining activity in manufacturing and services presented a challenge for the European Central Bank (ECB). Political deadlocks in key economies like Germany and France amplified uncertainty. Expectations for decisive ECB action rose which led to continued euro depreciation, with the currency reaching its lowest level since 2022.

US outperformance

In contrast with the Eurozone, the US economy demonstrated resilience, particularly in the services sector in November. This strength bolstered the dollar and drove interest rates higher early in the month. However, the rates eased later on following favorable inflation data, and the announcement of a moderate Treasury Secretary nominee.

Healthcare sector underperformed

The earnings season was overall good, with most sectors performing well. However, healthcare lagged, marking one of its weakest relative months in recent times. This underperformance mainly was linked to post-election uncertainty and Trump's nomination of industry critic Robert F. Kennedy Jr. as Health Secretary. Despite stable earnings reports, sector sentiment was negatively impacted.

FUND PERFORMANCE

In November, the fund increased by 2.5% in the main share class IC1 (EUR). Post-election volatility was notable, but strong contributions from most sub-sectors, particularly medical technology, buoyed the overall performance. Top contributors were Natera and Boston Scientific. The worst contributors were Evolent Health and ESSA Pharma.

Strong month for Natera following quarterly report

Natera is active in genetic testing and specializes in cell-free DNA testing to offer insights within oncology, reproductive health and organ transplants. They published a strong earnings report during the month, which underlined an increased level of utilization and higher average prices for their flagship product, Signatera. The stock increased by almost 40 percent during November.

Boston Scientific presented promising data

Boston Scientific is a leading medtech company focusing on cardiovascular health. The company presented positive data from the OPTION trial which contributed to the stocks increase during the month. The trial, which met all primary endpoints, evaluated the company's product WATCHMAN FLX, a device used for the closure of the left atrial appendage and thereby becoming an alternative to the use of blood thinners after ablation in patients with atrial fibrillation. Furthermore, the trial demonstrated improved safety compared to standard of care. These results strengthened the market's belief in the company's potential to further increase its total addressable market.

Weak earnings for Evolent Health

Evolent Health is a tech-enabled specialty care management company, primarily focused on oncology and cardiology. During the month, the company released weak earnings results, primarily attributable to prior period developments. The stock reaction was unforgiving due to management's bullish tone on conferences, and news reports of apparent takeout interest – interest which seemed to have disappeared by the end of the month.

Disappointing study results for ESSA's pipeline candidate

ESSA Pharma develops therapeutics targeting prostate cancer. Focus has been on their lead candidate, masofaniten, which inhibits the androgen receptor. During the month, the company had a major setback when the ongoing Phase 2 trial in metastatic castrate-resistant prostate cancer was discontinued. In a pre-defined analysis, the efficacy was deemed insufficient which also caused uncertainty concerning the future development of masofaniten. Consequently, the stock fell during the month.

RELECTIONS FROM THE MANAGERS

The healthcare sector had a particularly tough month relative to the stock market overall, but still ended the month up in euros. The sector has been struggling for a while, partly due to tech stocks performing so strongly and partly due to increasing uncertainty regarding potential cuts in healthcare spending following the American elections.

Concerns within the investor community

Donald Trump's nomination of Robert F Kennedy Jr to serve as US secretary of health and human services, and the establishment of the DOGE group, with entrepreneurs Elon Musk and Vivek Ramaswamy at the helm has caused concern within the investor community. The potential policy adjustments and spending cuts are seen as negative for the pharmaceutical industry. Additionally, cuts to the federal grants towards Medicaid are also being contemplated. The main concerns in the short term are how much any potential changes would mean lower total compensation to the hospitals, and also how much markets for the insurance companies operating in Medicaid would worsen.

Vaccinations and related guidelines, documentation, and side effects are controversial for many Americans and there are many skeptics, primarily among Republicans. They feel heard and represented by RFK. However, any major changes in the short term are unlikely.

We still believe the sector has potential to deliver

The interest in cyclical stocks seems to be increasing, while defensives, such as healthcare stocks, are not currently viewed by the broader investor group as likely 2025 winners. In our view, valuations are attractive, and that the sector has the potential to deliver positive news flow in the coming year. The fact that it is not the most favored sector, could in fact be a blessing in disguise. Low expectations combined with good prospects to perform well is something which makes us more comfortable and ought to lead to good risk/reward. If interest rates continue to come down, which is our main scenario, small and midcap stocks could come back into favor.
