Monthly comment

April was dominated by renewed US-China trade tensions. On April 2, the US announced a 10 percent global tariff on all imports into the US, alongside steep 'reciprocal tariffs' of up to 145 percent specifically targeting imports from China. The average tariff rate on imports to the US thus reached its highest level in over a century.

The escalation triggered a broad-based market reaction, and the S&P 500 was down 11 percent over two trading days and volatility rose sharply. While equity markets recovered almost entirely later in the month, sentiment remained fragile. A weaker US dollar helped cushion global declines from a US investor's perspective.

The sharp increase in tariffs caused several banks to revise down their GDP outlooks. Some retailers, including Walmart and Target, continued to import from China despite the higher duties, which could result in higher consumer prices and weaker retail margins going forward. JP Morgan CEO, Jamie Dimon, warned that prolonged tariffs could fuel inflation, reduce investments, and ultimately risk a recession. A 90-day pause for some tariffs was introduced late in the month, but uncertainty remained high.

US economy contracted in Q1

Preliminary GDP data showed a 0.3 percent contraction in the US economy during the first quarter, driven by front-loaded imports and inventory build-up. Inflation, measured as PCE, came in slightly above expectations. Despite the equity rebound toward the month-end, overall market sentiment remained cautious.

Healthcare sector impacted by political uncertainty

April brought further signs of political instability in the US healthcare system. Several senior officials resigned and new cost-saving proposals were introduced. These developments are likely to reduce the FDA's regulatory capacity and extend drug approval timelines. Proposed cuts to public healthcare programs were met with strong public opposition, though the Republican-led Congress continued to push for reduced spending.

Earnings season themes

Roughly half of the healthcare companies had reported by month-end. Results were slightly ahead of consensus estimates and showed some resilience. Common themes included the impact of tariffs, exemptions by product class, US manufacturing announcements, and a more selective capital expenditure environment. Several large pharmaceuticals and some medtech companies flagged their intention to increase domestic production partly in response to political incentives, and partly to broader supply chain shifts.

Fund performance

The fund declined by -4.8 percent in the IC1 (EUR), while in US dollar terms, the fund was up slightly during the month. Net exposure was reduced somewhat. The short book contributed positively, and multiple positions closed at appealing valuation levels.

Large- and mid-cap names detracted the most, while smaller companies contributed positively. Healthcare services weighed on returns following a weak report from UnitedHealth Group. Still, the sub-sector remained a positive contributor YTD. The strongest contributors were Eli Lilly and a short position. The weakest were UnitedHealth Group and Bristol-Myers Squibb.

Positive data on Eli Lilly's oral obesity candidate

Driven by positive data on its oral GLP-1 candidate, orforglipron, Eli Lilly's shares performed well in April. The study that was performed on diabetes patients showed a better-than-expected clinical profile. Data on obesity patients will be presented in Q3. Also in April, the company put up a strong script trend for the obesity product, Zepbound, which provided support for the shares.

Short position closed after sharp correction

A short position in a China-exposed company with high capex needs fell by around 25 percent early in the month. The position was closed after the stock reached more reasonable valuation levels.

UnitedHealth fell heavily on weak earnings

UnitedHealth Group is a vertically-integrated managed care company. The company operates care clinics and provides healthcare technology, as well as being the world's largest health insurance company. During the month, the company released earnings figures that disappointed investors. The financial outlook was reduced primarily on weaker-than-expected results in the Optum Health and Group Medicare Advantage segments. The main culprit was that the company had failed to execute against the phase-in of the new risk adjustment model, also called CMS-HCC model V28.

A challenging month for Bristol-Myers Squibb

The pharmaceutical company Bristol Myers-Squibb has increasingly shifted its focus towards its growth portfolio, including Cobenfy (KarXT) for schizophrenia. The company announced, in April, that KarXT had not hit the primary endpoint as an add-on therapy versus standard of care in the schizophrenia Phase 3 trial ARISE. Heading into the earnings report, the stock was also pressured by concerns of how much the changes in the federal healthcare reimbursement system (Part D redesign) would impact the company's legacy products. Consequently, the stock fell back during the month.

Reflections

Interestingly, markets reacted more constructively to in-line and slightly below-expected results during the earnings season. We interpreted this as a tentative but positive shift in sentiment, especially for small and mid-cap names, where valuations remained compressed.

Sector valuations remained attractive, and in some areas, they declined even further. Many small-cap biotech names continued to trade at near or below net cash levels. Selectivity remained key, with a clear divergence emerging between well-funded companies with strong development pipelines and those facing financing headwinds.

We are particularly focused on the obesity treatment landscape, where new data and shifting competitive dynamics are expected throughout the year. We also continue to see opportunities in the screening space, cardiovascular, and health enablers where there is potential for growing utilization trends.

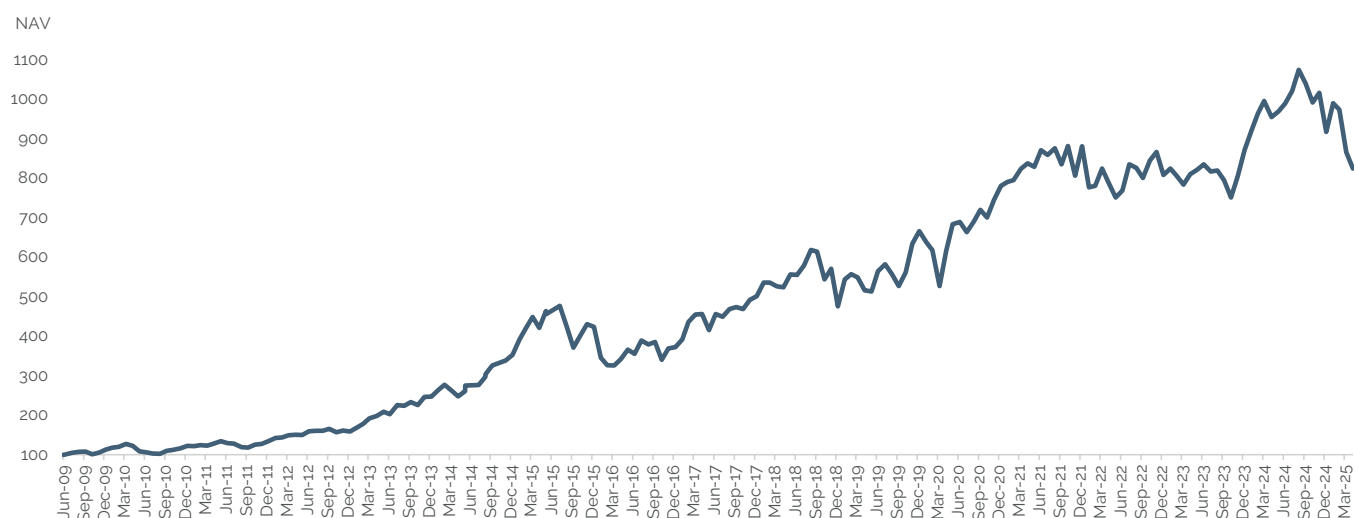

Regulatory caution remains warranted

We remain watchful of developments within the US Department of Health and Human Services. Delays or changes in the regulatory process could impact several companies. That said, the long-term structural drivers of the healthcare sector remain intact.

We also expect increased M&A activity as larger companies need to bolster growth through acquisitions. Many large pharmaceuticals are facing patent cliffs and will need to supplement their pipelines. Once budget and trade uncertainties stabilize, we believe this could unlock a more active deal environment.
