MONTHLY UPDATE

The uncertain outcome of the US presidential election, along with the increasing spread of Covid-19, resulted in a gradual decline in investor risk appetite in October. The month was thus the worst since March of this year.

Politics, Covid-19 and technology stocks dominated the period

US politics, Covid-19 and technology stocks once again took centre stage in October. Following the rally from the lows at the end of March, when US technology companies in particular performed very strongly, October was marked by profit-taking and increased caution. Despite generally strong reports, exchange rate reactions were restrained. This was especially true of the major US technology companies, whose reports, with just a few exceptions, sent share prices down.

Presidential campaign still polarised

After President Trump tested positive for Covid-19 a month ago and then recovered, the presidential campaign continued. Although the tone became more restrained between President Trump and Democratic Joe Biden in the final weeks ahead of the election, their rhetoric was marked by continued polarisation. Biden's primary attack was on the current administration's handling of the pandemic, while President Trump warned against the Democrats' socialist reform agenda. Meanwhile, negotiations between Republican Steve Mnuchin and Democrat Nancy Pelosi over new stimulus packages failed.

Second pandemic wave spread concern for Europe's economies

The second wave of Covid-19 accelerated during the month, particularly in Europe, and countries such as France, Spain, Germany and the UK again imposed restrictions similar to those during the spring. There were some differences, however. For example, schools in several countries will be kept open, and industrial production maintained to as a great extent as possible. The rapidly deteriorating situation has taken politicians and experts by surprise in many countries, thereby fuelling concerns over the potential negative effects on economies.

World index fell – only Hong Kong was up

The world index decreased in October. Utilities were the only sector to record an uptick, while information technology and energy companies delivered the worst performances. In terms of regions, Hong Kong was the only one to show gains while the US and Europe in particular recorded declines.

FUND PERFORMANCE

The fund decreased by 2.7 percent in its main share class IC1 (EUR). All subsectors impacted negatively on fund performance. The best contributors to the fund were MyoKardia and Mirati Therapeutics. The worst contributors were Vertex Pharmaceuticals and Roche.

MyoKardia stock up following bid from Bristol-Myers Squibb

MyoKardia is a US biotechnology company specialising in innovative therapies for the treatment of heart muscle disorders. Clinical trials of the company's most advanced drug candidate, mavacamten, have shown statistically significant improvements in symptoms in patients with hypertrophic cardiomyopathy (HCM). HCM is a condition in which the wall of the left ventricle becomes thick, sometimes leading to severe heart failure, stroke or sudden death.

MyoKardia has been an important holding for the fund since 2017. In October, Bristol-Myers Squibb made a bid for the company worth 13.1 billion dollars, representing a premium of 61 percent.

Mirati's research results sent stock up

Mirati Therapeutics is a US biotechnology company that develops targeted cancer therapies. Investors have shown particular interest in the company's research on mutations in the KRAS gene, with Mirati and Amgen leading developments with their respective projects. In October Mirati presented convincing tumour response data from a study in non-small-cell lung cancer. Unlike many other gene mutations that are often rare, the KRAS mutation is relatively common in several tumour types, and thus offers significant market potential for any approved drug.

Early studies have also shown that there may be potential synergies in combination therapy with KRAS inhibitors and a PD-L1 inhibitor, making the mechanism of action interesting as a complement to companies whose sales are mainly centred on PD-L1 inhibitors.

All in all, this boosted the share price by 31 percent in October.

Vertex market value down after failed study

Vertex Pharmaceuticals is a US research company that is the market leader in treatments of cystic fibrosis (CF). CF is a highly rare genetic disorder that affects the body's mucous membranes. Its clearest clinical manifestation is reduced lung function and therefore impaired breathing. Vertex has a portfolio of drugs with which to treat CF, and their various combinations are currently standard treatment for patients worldwide. Thanks to the company's success in developing effective treatments for CF, Vertex has one of the fastest growing sales and profit outlooks in the industry.

However, the success of CF makes the company somewhat of a one-trick pony and thus vulnerable. Hopes were high, therefore, regarding the results of a study in alpha-1 antitrypsin deficiency (AAT deficiency), an inherited condition affecting the liver and lungs. When the study failed, the stock plummeted.

The company's market value fell by 16.6 billion dollars in October, which does not reflect the value of the project but rather the increased uncertainty in Vertex's long-term forecasts.

Tough pressure in pharmaceutical subsector negatively affected Roche

Since the start of the year, Roche has been one of the pharmaceutical companies that has fared best, with a decrease by 5 percent compared with the pharmaceutical subsector as a whole, which is down 12 percent in euros. Nevertheless, Roche became one of the fund's negative contributors in October. Contrary to what we had expected from our most stable companies – those with the least variation in revenues, profits and cash flows, pharmaceutical companies have been the worst performing subsector during the pandemic. Pharmaceutical valuations are historically low these days, both in absolute and relative terms, most likely due to excessive concerns over price reforms in the US market.

Roche's share price has been under pressure for the past five years due to investor concerns over the effects of generic competition. During these five years, the company had an average annual sales growth of slightly more than 6 percent in local currencies and continuously renewed its product portfolio. Roche also possesses one of the broadest and most innovative research portfolios in the pharmaceutical industry.

OUTLOOK

After a long wait for the US election results and a focus on the likelihood of a blue wave (a Democratic president, House of Representatives and Senate), we now have an answer, albeit not definitive. For the healthcare sector, it is important for US policy not to move too far to the left. Admittedly, there will probably be a Democratic president and a continued Democratic majority in the House of Representatives, but the Senate is still in the balance, and we do not expect a Democratic administration with the strength to dominate. Both chambers of Congress will need to shift to the centre to avoid losing majorities, so it is unlikely that major reforms that are not well-crafted and well-entrenched will be signed into law or become part of the budget. Exactly what the Senate will look like is probably the biggest uncertainty at the time of writing, since it would appear that Biden is set to become president. Not entirely irrelevant is the fact that the Democrats' majority in the House appears to be shrinking, thus limiting the influence of the left-wing.

More favourable political period awaits us after a healthy reporting season

We now look forward to a political environment for the healthcare sector that is both more favourable and somewhat calmer. Reforms will be thrashed out in both chambers and require compromises. There may possibly be a bold, confrontational yet weak Democratic majority in Congress and a determined president, but for the moment the market is focusing on other risks and considerations.

The reporting season for the third quarter that is now coming to an end has been good, even better than expected. The downsides have mainly been related to the hard-to-assess outlooks for next year. We expect that 2021 will be adversely affected by the Covid-19 pandemic, even though our sector is better off than most others on many fronts.

We look forward to upward trends – with caution

The sector was heavily oversold in the days prior to the election. We are now expecting better times, and if there are no unexpected political entanglements or macroeconomic shocks associated with a second pandemic wave, we should see solid progress in the future. However, we are taking nothing for granted.
