MONTHLY UPDATE

US budget negotiations, the Chinese housing market, energy shortages and inflation worries characterized capital markets in September. On the heels of virtually uninterrupted share price gains so far in 2021, investors' risk appetite declined markedly during the month. In the absence of earnings reports and other more significant corporate transactions, developments in the global economy and politics became the main focus.

A rough start to the fall for President Biden

In the United States, President Joe Biden got off to a rough start this fall. Following the chaotic evacuation of Afghanistan in August, interest shifted towards the budget process and the looming debt ceiling. The latter was averted at the last minute in Congress but it will however come back in December. Otherwise, the budget efforts were sluggish in terms of infrastructure investments, drug price regulation and tax increases. In addition to the Republicans' firm opposition, the Democrats struggled to agree on the way forward.

As for inflation, the US Federal Reserve also began to quake in its boots. In a shift away from this summer's announcement that price pressures were transitory, the Fed began to predict a decline in government bond purchases, known as tapering, in late fall. This was also reflected in the bond market, where interest rates on long-term bonds rose in September.

Federal election and runaway oil prices in Europe

In Europe, parliamentary elections in Germany, the region's largest economy, were perhaps the biggest event of the month. Social Democrat Olaf Scholz will likely form a coalition government with the Greens and other parties, which could lead to concerns over tax increases and thus a diminishing willingness to invest.

Runaway energy prices also attracted plenty of interest. A summer without much sun or wind, combined with rising prices for coal, oil and emission allowances, sent electricity prices up to record highs both in Europe and much of the rest of the world. In an environment already plagued by bottlenecks in the global supply chains and high freight costs, this triggered increasing concerns about inflation.

Chinese Evergrande's troubles raised questions

Although the troubles of Chinese property developer Evergrande were well known, the company's acute shortage of cash made headlines. This, in turn, led to an argument that China's housing market was overvalued; something that potentially could have negative consequences for the country's growth.

Energy up in otherwise weak markets

September was one of the weakest months of the year, just as it usually is. For many markets, this was the first month of decline during 2021. Overall, global indices recorded a downturn. Energy was in essence the only sector to record a significant upturn, followed by banks, though gains were marginal in the sector. Other sectors fell, with information technology and commodities falling most. In terms of regions, Japan rose while Europe, the United States and Hong Kong fell.

FUND PERFORMANCE

The fund decreased by 4.6 percent in its main share class IC1 (EUR). The healthcare sector performed somewhat worse than the broader market during the month. All subsectors detracted from the fund's returns. Key clinical data and buyout rumors boosted the performance of biotechnology during the first part of the month, but a general decline in the market's risk appetite caused this sector to end the period on the minus side too.

The fund's best contributors this month were Acceleron Pharma and AstraZeneca. The worst contributors were Biogen and Apellis Pharmaceuticals.

Merck's bid for Acceleron Pharma sent share price up

Acceleron is a US biotechnology company with a unique focus on disease progression attributable to imbalances in the proteins belonging to the TGF-beta superfamily. Reblozyl is approved for the treatment of beta-thalassemia and myelodysplastic syndrome, while sotatercept is being developed for the treatment of pulmonary arterial hypertension (PAH).

Acceleron was the subject of takeover rumors during the month, driving strong share price performance. At the end of the month, the rumors were confirmed when Merck made an 11.5 billion dollar bid for the company.

AstraZeneca's share price rose after clinical trials

AstraZeneca is a global pharmaceutical company. In recent years the company has launched several new drugs for the treatment of solid tumors, generating strong sales growth. In September, AstraZeneca presented results from its clinical trials which both strengthen the competitiveness and broaden the market potential for two of its cancer drugs, Lynparza for prostate cancer and Enhertu for breast cancer.

AstraZeneca is one of the fund's five largest holdings. The company's share price performance in September thus contributed positively to the fund's returns.

Biogen's forecasts revised down and the stock fell

Biogen is a US biotechnology company. Since the initial positive reaction that followed the FDA's controversial decision in June earlier this year to approve Aduhelm for treating Alzheimer's, the share price has fallen back to pre-approval levels. Both prescribing physicians and payers are hesitant about the treatment due to the lack of clear clinical data.

The launch therefore turned out worse than expected, causing forecasts to be revised down. In addition, increasing competition is expected on several fronts as Eli Lilly, Roche and Eisai/Bioarctic are making progress on their respective drug candidates with similar mechanisms of action. The current valuation, however, reflects only limited cash flows from Aduhelm.

Apellis Pharmaceuticals' share price declined sharply after failed Phase 3 trial

Apellis is a US biotechnology company that develops new drugs by addressing the complement system. The company already has approval for Empaveli, a C3 inhibitor for the treatment of paroxysmal nocturnal hemoglobinuria (PNH). The same substance has also been evaluated in geographic atrophy (GA), one of the main causes of blindness.

During the month, the company presented results from two comprehensive Phase 3 trials, DERBY and OAKS. While the results from OAKS demonstrated statistically significant reduction in lesion growth compared with placebo, DERBY missed its endpoint. The share price plummeted, since it is now unclear whether the company needs to conduct another trial before it can apply for approval.

OUTLOOK

The market is balancing between pessimism and optimism. Are rising oil prices dampening the global economy? Will inflationary pressures be higher and last longer than expected? Are profit margins peaking now, and will profit growth be worse as a result? Are supply issues in the manufacturing industry only temporary as a result of bottlenecks in the semiconductor industry? How great is the need to curb excesses in China's property sector, and how will it impact the economy? Is the China-Taiwan situation heading for military conflict? Is the US at risk of a debt moratorium? How large will the next US budget be, and what reforms are on the way? Could we be facing another coronavirus wave this winter? Will the Fed's upcoming tapering result in rising long-term interest rates, and will this in turn negatively impact the stock market? How much will US profits be affected by rising corporate taxes? Are stock markets overvalued because of artificially low interest rates?

The questions are many – but this is typical when it comes to market ambivalence during the September-October period. Although some of the threats are very real, they are not new, and we will live with many of them for a long time to come.

In our view, the above questions are manageable

Currently, we see the glass as half full rather than half empty.

- The price of oil, in reality, is low from a long-term perspective, adjusted for inflation and purchasing power.
- Inflation is certainly rising, but will likely decrease in the coming year.
- The potential for corporate rationalization remains high.
- The supply of semiconductors will increase as early as 2022.
- The property industry in China should, despite its troubles, be viewed as a local problem.
- Although China's moves against Taiwan are undeniably quite frightening, this is something we have been worried about for a very long time.
- In our assessment, the US will not suspend its debt payments.
- The next US budget, known as "Build Back Better", is likely to land at about 2 trillion dollars and not the proposed 3.5 trillion, which the market should be able to accept as a reasonable compromise. There will likely be many social reforms on the horizon, though still limited in scope.
- Yes, we might face a smaller new coronavirus wave this winter, and the stock market will see it as a temporary slowdown in the economy. Also, treatment options in tablet form are now on their way.
- Long-term interest rates are likely to rise – yet this is a healthy sign which shouldn't prevent the stock market from hitting new records.
- Increased corporate taxes in the US are largely discounted but this is of course negative from the perspective of stocks, all else being equal.
- Stock markets might be overvalued and thus yield lower returns over the next ten years. We do not believe so.

We remain convinced that our sector, healthcare, is experiencing a continued high pace of innovation coupled with significant human needs for better treatments. Its prospects are bright and hold many interesting investment opportunities. Despite gloomy fall weather, our sights are set on the future and a rebound of the stock market.
