MONTHLY UPDATE

Equity markets continued their relentless upward trajectory in July. Positive inflation data, seemingly more dovish central banks, and robust earnings all made investors feel ever more comfortable. The peak in interest rates seemed near while, at the same time, the economy and thus earnings were holding up better than feared - a so called "soft landing" scenario. Risk willingness increased during the month, which was also reflected in falling pricing for protection such as put options.

Throughout 2023, the rising stock market has blindsided many investors who have been influenced by the overwhelmingly negative views of many investment bank strategists ever since last fall. As the market continued to develop strongly in July, some of the most vocal "bears" among sell-side firms acknowledged that they had got it wrong.

Strong results from tech and banks

The Q2 reporting season has, so far, showed better-than-estimated earnings overall. Not least the much-anticipated earnings of many US technology giants, by far the best-performing group this year, have generally supported the market even though some fell short of expectations. Other sectors, not least banks, reported strong results, alleviating fears of a negative impact from a downturn in the economy.

Signs of imminent end to the hiking cycle?

Both the Federal Reserve and the ECB hiked their interest rates at their respective July meetings. However, against the backdrop of falling inflation numbers, both central banks conveyed the message of a data-dependent outlook going forward. This was interpreted as an imminent end to the hiking cycle, especially in the US, whereas Christine Lagarde, the head of the ECB, warned that inflation was still too high.

Mixed messages from Asia

The new governor of the Japanese central bank, Kazuo Ueda, surprisingly announced a policy change involving an increase in the tolerated range of government bonds from 0.5 percent to 1.0 percent, and thus probably ending a three-decade long era of ultra-low yields. In China, where the anticipated pick-up in growth following the re-opening has underwhelmed so far this year, the authorities unveiled several measures to boost economic activity in general and to bolster private consumption in particular.

Wagner regrouped in Belarus

The war in Ukraine continued without any major breakthroughs for either side. The Ukrainian counter-offensive seemed to get bogged down by the extensive fortifications made by the Russians over the past year. As munitions were becoming scarce, the US cleared deliveries of controversial cluster-bombs, probably as a stop-gap measure until production of conventional shells catches up. Meanwhile, the Wagner mercenaries concluded their operations in Ukraine, and regrouped in Belarus. This was seen by some as a threat to neighboring countries such as Poland.

World index up for the fifth consecutive month

The world index rose in July for a fifth consecutive month, again with differences depending on base currency. Looking at global sectors, financials and energy noted the best gains, while healthcare and utilities posted decreases. Among major markets, this year's laggard, Hong Kong, made a comeback, being the best-performing region, followed by the Nasdaq. The broader markets in the US and Europe fared equally well, while Japan declined.

FUND PERFORMANCE

In July, the fund decreased by 2.2 percent in its main share class IC1 (EUR). The fund's holdings in the pharmaceutical subsector contributed to its performance, whereas holdings in the other sub-sectors detracted from the fund's performance. The month's best contributors were Axonics and Argenx. The worst contributors were Apellis Pharmaceuticals and HCA.

Axonics up after strong second-quarter earnings

Axonics presented a strong earnings report where both of its segments, Sacral neuromodulation and Bulkamid, beat consensus estimates, and the company raised the full-year outlook by more than the beat. The report indicated a stronger utilization trend in the back half of the year. Furthermore, they provided confidence in the long-term bladder and bowel dysfunction market growth. The stock increased by 20 percent in July.

Argenx's drug delivered in much anticipated trial

Argenx's Vyvgart, which drives down circulating levels of antibodies, did not disappoint in the ADHERE study in chronic inflammatory demyelinating polyneuropathy (CIDP). The results exceeded expectations and further strengthened Vyvgart's potential as a broad treatment paradigm with multiple indications being evaluated. The stock rose by 29 percent in July.

Unexpected blow to Apellis' eye disease drug

Apellis' lead product, Syfovre, for advanced eye disease geographic atrophy came under scrutiny after reporting rare but severe cases of retinal occlusive vasculitis during the month. Knowledge of how to manage this side effect remains unclear given the limited exposure, as Syfovre was only approved in February this year. The resulting concern dampened the ongoing launch, and with potential competition looming this autumn, Apellis' stock plunged 72 percent in July.

HCA fell back after reporting earnings

The utilization trade, i.e., the bet that deferred care volumes would bounce back this year after being subdued during the pandemic, took a breather in July. HCA reported results that were relatively strong, although the company was not able to meet the high expectations. The stock fell back somewhat during the month after being a strong performer during the first half of the year.

OUTLOOK

The setback for Apellis was tough. Fortunately, the fund has only rarely been affected by unexpected side effects for a drug in clinical practice that had a major impact on a company's valuation. Additionally, our starting point is always to balance the size of the holding with the risk of major setbacks. Sometimes, however, unexpected things do occur, and the fund has indeed suffered from major commercial setbacks as a result of events in the clinic a few times. Diversification in healthcare investing is therefore very important, and the existence of quite a few different types of significant binary outcomes means that it is difficult to have a concentrated portfolio in the traditional way.

Better-than-expected earnings season

The earnings season (which is still ongoing) has been encouraging. Many of our companies reported better-than-expected results. There is a good level of growth in the industry, despite Covid no longer making any meaningful contribution and even putting up a small headwind in the form of declining sales, inventory liquidation and reduced new orders relating to Covid. It has taken somewhat longer than expected to unwind Covid sales for some companies, for example in the area tools, i.e., research and production equipment, but examples of this can be found elsewhere too.

Potential but questions marks around AI

We do believe there is a relatively bright future ahead for many healthcare companies. The fact that the interest in tech companies' AI investments is intense may provoke envy, but we see the long-term potential in that AI could lead to lower costs, more efficient care production (which is obvious in diagnostics) and better clinical outcomes. What is more difficult to assess is whether it will provide lasting competitive advantage for individual companies in the sector or whether it is about efficiency in general. We will likely see examples of both. The service companies will undeniably gain even greater economies of scale, which will favor the largest companies most.

Go on the defensive?

We are entering a quieter period, statistically speaking. August and September are historically weaker months. October is generally more volatile. We believe that our continuous focus on investing in profitable, slightly larger companies will be the right strategy going forward. These companies are somewhat more defensive by nature, they currently have attractive values and should be able to weather the good times as well as the bad times.

A rotation towards value stocks and stable growth companies may be relevant in the fall, but right now the optimism around technology companies and the orientation towards high growth is quite pronounced. A rising stock market as a result of surprisingly strong economic growth should be able to provide support for the healthcare sector, although other sectors may benefit even more. A slowdown in the economy because of higher real interest rates and credit tightening should be able to highlight the defensive characteristics of the sector.
